"Pall up right there-I'll take that bet." said a voice in the crowd.

The sole proprietor of that voice was BLYNNES. What he was doing there in that town, how long he had been there, and when he intended to leave, is no business of ours. It is enough to know that he was there, and considered that t-n dollars as good as his own. He made his way through the assembled yeomanry and mounted the box by the side of the man of merciful oil, who looked as if he didn't exactly like the turn things had taken; but the crowd laughed, as crowds always will under such circumstances, and he lacked the courage to back out. The "prehminaries" were soon arranged, it being agreed that the proprietor of the oil should exhaust his ten minutes and then let BLYXXXS follow, "in his own way, without the slightest interruption" from the former.

BLYNNES descended from the box, and the other threw off his coat, turned his tongue loose, and let it wag as never tongue wagged before. He kept everybody in the best sort of humor, and at the expiration of his ten minutes had sold six bottles of his incompar able oil, and considered the bet won. BLYNNES mounted the box-his first appearance upon any stage as a retail dealer in patent medicines-and amid the applause of the by-standers proceeded to business without a smile-as solemuly, in fact, as if he had come to preach the funeral of his grand-

I reached the melancholy spot. There lay my friend in all the immobility of a marble stature thrown from its pedestal. These intelligent gentlemen did testify to that eff ct. and the victimiz d individual was forced to stand back and witness in forious but impotent wrath the rapid sale of his Scandinavo-Icelaudic Oil" at the unprecedentedly los price herein before mentioned.

BLYNNES still had three minutes and a half to spare when he announced, with many expressions of regret, that his stock of oil was entirely exhausted, and advised the purchasers to go home and grease their boots with the article as the surest method of getting the worth of their money.
